Graduate Studies at York University in Toronto, Canada

I wish to thank the Ivalo & Minik Fonden for the grant I received in 2019, which enabled me to enroll in a master's program in Translation Studies at York University in Toronto, Canada.

This grant advanced my scholarly and career development in translation and technical communication. As an Inuk translator and interpreter working with Greenlandic, Danish, and English, I gained valuable international perspectives on language, Indigenous languages, technical communication, and translation practices through my studies abroad.

Although I did not complete the master's program at York University because my academic focus shifted in response to the rapid development of AI and its global implications for translators, the experience strongly shaped my academic growth and professional perspective. My studies exposed me to advanced theories and approaches in translation studies, which broadened my understanding of the role of language professionals in multilingual and multicultural societies.

This experience further motivated me to pursue higher education, and I have remained committed to both my professional and academic development. I am currently enrolled in an online master's program in Technical Communication and Localization at the University of Strasbourg in France. The foundation established through my studies and experiences in Canada continues to support my interest in language technology, localization, and research on Indigenous languages.

The grant gave me an opportunity to take a major step in my scholarly path. I remain deeply grateful for the scholarship support.

Sincerely,
Sussi Jensen
